THE WAGON OF THE WEST!

As important as the determined people and the weapons they carried, were the wagons they used in the winning of the West. The covered wagon has become a symbol of die-hard pioneering, for without this particular type of wagon the long Western trek would have been almost impossible for the doughty pioneers and their families.

The Conestoga Wagon was the basic freight vehicle of the Western trails. It was first developed and made in the Conestoga Valley of Lancaster County, Pennsylvania in the early 1700's. Built to withstand the rigors of any terrain the Conestoga was the first wagon to cross the Plains and the Rockies. Studebaker and the U.S. Army later modified the basic model, making it lighter and more maneuverable for immigrants and army trains.

In the West the Conestogas were first pulled by oxen, later by Missouri mules and horses. They were built so sturdily that they made their own trails and roads where roads had never been before. They could withstand both the shock and wrench of broken terrain and keep their stability and remain upright, and the varied weather and climes without warpage. They had the buoyancy necessary to float them across wide bodies of swift water, and the wooden sides were a fortress and bulwark against Indian attack.

The Conestoga Wagon, and variants of this model, derive from the English road wagon adapted to American needs by Richard Carter, a wagonwright and wheelwright who came from England and established his wagons in Pennsylvania before 1750. It was he who developed the medium-sized, dished front wheels, and huge dished rear wheels, to throw the load forward for more efficient drawbar pull.

The Conestoga Wagon is as much a part of Americana as the Sharp's Rifle, the buffalo and the Indians.

GOLD!

"All that glitters is not gold," Shakespeare warned. But, when that glitter IS gold, man will find it, whether it is discovered in the wilderness or a remote mountain stream, and regardless of the hazards he may encounter in the search.

The story of gold is a fantastic tale of adventure and varied usage. The modern science of chemistry was based on experiments by ancient alchemists trying to turn baser metals into glittering gold. Gold is seldom out of the news. As a monetary reserve to back currency it is a prime concern of all countries. As a metal in commercial use it has amazing versatility. It has great decorative application for jewelry, fashion accessories and trophy awards. It is used for dental fillings and caps, and electroplated it plays a vital part in industry.

A single grain of gold can be drawn into a sturdy wire 500 feet in length, and an ounce of gold can be stretched almost a mile. Gold leaf, as thin as modern gilding, was found in Egyptian tombs thousands of years old, proving that the art of working gold is ancient.

Most important is the usage of gold in science. Heavy-duty gold electroplate protects vital components of computers and multi-million dollar rockets and missiles. The original earth satellites blasted into space in this country were coated with gold, as were most of the internal parts and instrument housings for protection against the rigors of space travel at 18,000 miles per hour.

No replacement has ever been found for the various usages of the yellow metal that glitters, and quite possibly, none ever will be found.
